The Ink Garden

Harn Museum of Art, Gainesville, Florida

I. Wet

To soar is to fall, the hawk said to the lamp post where it perched. You stop rowing the wings,

 trusting heat to open its hand beneath you--but you’re distracted by a gash
in the sky below:

 a lizard treading the air from stalk to stone. In the water garden of the museum

 (a postage stamp stuck to a postcard of lawn) that anolis rules from his wee boulder.

He puffs the blood petal
at his throat. When he outgrows a skin, he devours it.

To escape Death’s talons,
he shed his tail. Another grew, less whippy, but no matter--

the empereur-philosophe reigns.
He dreamed he was butterfly--or did dusty wings, eyespots and all,
see themselves as chameleon?
The blood maples’s lacy gloves flutter away,
singed by sun.

Dare a single mosquito charge the footbridge with straight pin drawn?

II. Dry

_The gravel said,_
How many æons back were we next door to the Atlas Mountains?
Continents drifted apart like families.
At the dawn of rail,

crews broke us up for track ballast.
Then they shunted
that golden age down a siding to rust.
They sold us off.

Crushed to peas for the landscaper,
sifted and graded,
the mountain came to the museum
of leftovers,

where the nothing dug up somewhere
is plonked on a pedestal.
Where on the roof of the loading dock
they installed a dry garden.

Which the gardener must clear just in case a god is looking for a boulder to slip into. There’s an ocean to rake.
But first he asks the big stones
what they want. O to be islands!
    He asks the camellias,
who don’t look happy in their pots.
    Does he ask what’s underfoot?

We weren’t always Salt and Pepper Gravel,
    Aggregate size 3.
We are watered to the crispness of new money.
    We comb into wavelets.

    The world is empty, the world is empty, lord,
    It is empty of a self,
of anything that would seem close to a self.
    Thus is the world empty.

Debora Greger